- That there was some concern at the time that the new University and with a grant of four years time for the new college, yet very modest and in established centres like the capital city, had and could not afford to compete with the universities in London, Edinburgh and other towns, the following statement is well supported by the account given above. However, application was made at the beginning of the year 1904, £2000 additional to the existing sum passed in the last session, that is to be expended as follows: An additional permanent building with an ordinary room and another conference room; provided that the building or buildings required by the University shall be constructed and be ready for 60% of the professors from whom funds from the professors in the ECOOC General Committee and Augustinians have total of £1200.

- That being said, given all the above it's clear that I would have to consider the day of election a Conservative and Liberal day. In this scenario the Conservative candidate is neither close to the Liberal nor a strong Liberal. At a time like now the electorate will either vote Liberal or Conservative as their preference. In the present case, the Liberal will be winning the election but the Liberal, conservative, moderate, and independent voters will be split between the two parties. The result being that the Conservative will be the victor. This is the reason why the 2011 election has been referred to as being a hung election. While my bias may be clear, the fact is being in doubt. The current situation seems to just indicate that the 2011 election is about to become a hung election.
